Travis had heard the words come out of his mouth and been as stunned as the two men he'd come to know so well in recent weeks. Yet as soon as his brain had processed the audio signals, he'd recognized their unshakable truth. If trading his air force flight suit for one with an EAS patch on it would win Kate back, he'd make the change today.

"So what do you think?" he asked her. "Again, your first, no-frills, no-holds-barred gut reaction?"

"I won't lie," she admitted slowly, reluctantly. "My head, my heart, my gut all leaped for joy."

He started for her, elation pumping through his veins. The hand she slapped against his chest to stop him made only a tiny dent in his fierce joy.

"Wait, Trav! This is too big a decision to make without talking it over. Let's...let's use this time together to make sure it's what you really want."

"I'm sure. Now."

"Well, I'm not." Her brown eyes showed an agony of doubt. "The military's been your whole life up to now."

"Wrong." He laid his hand over hers, felt the warmth of her palm against his sternum. "You came first, Katydid. Before the uniform, before the wings, before the head rush and stomach-twisting responsibilities of being part of a crew. I let those get in the way the past few years. That won't happen again."

The doubt was still there in her eyes, swimming in a pool of indecision. He needed to back off, Travis conceded. Give her a few days to accept what was now a done deal in his mind.

"Okay," he said with a sense of rightness he hadn't felt in longer than he could remember, "we'll head up to Venice. Let Ellis's proposal percolate for a day or two."

And then, he vowed, they would conduct a virtual burning of the divorce decree before he took his wife to bed.
